

William F. McMurry

William F. McMurry represents a distinguished legacy in Kentucky law, carrying forward a tradition of legal excellence as a third-generation attorney. Born in Paducah in 1955, his early exposure to the legal profession came through watching his father, Pelham McMurry, serve first as County Attorney for 13 years and then as County Judge for 7 years. These formative experiences in the courthouse halls of Western Kentucky would shape his future dedication to justice.

After law school, McMurry served three years as an Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney in both McCracken (serving Commonwealth's Attorney, Mark P. Bryant and Jefferson County (serving Commonwealth's Attorney, David L. Armstrong), where he tried the most violent crimes, including murder by strangulation, murder by Liquid Fire (pure sulfuric acid), child rape and sexual abuse cases to jury verdict. These prosecutions, among the most emotionally challenging cases in criminal law, forged his commitment to pursuing justice for society's most vulnerable victims.

Throughout his career, McMurry has distinguished himself as a fearless advocate for society's most vulnerable. His practice has focused particularly on representing children and families affected by negligence and abuse, taking on cases that many other attorneys wouldn't touch. Early in his career, he successfully championed the rights of young children wrongfully incarcerated in adult facilities, including a 6-year-old detained for taking bubble gum and a 5-year-old imprisoned simply for being present during his father's arrest.

In 1997, McMurry took on a groundbreaking case representing women who had been sexually abused by their workers' compensation attorney. The case began when two sisters discovered they had both been victimized by the same lawyer, who had exploited his position of trust by falsely claiming medical expertise and conducting unnecessary "physical examinations" of his female clients. As McMurry's investigation deepened, he uncovered that thirty years earlier, the same attorney had been reported to the Kentucky Bar Association for performing a vaginal examination on a female client in his office. Despite a hearing officer finding probable cause, the Kentucky Supreme Court had quietly dismissed that complaint as "so preposterous as to not be believable" – a decision made under rules that kept all bar complaints strictly confidential. As the 1997 case unfolded, dozens of additional women came forward, revealing a pattern of abuse spanning three decades. When the earlier victim shared her story with the Courier-Journal, the resulting public outcry led to a landmark change: the Kentucky Supreme Court revised its secrecy rules, making all bar complaints public after a finding of probable cause. The case not only resulted in a settlement that held the perpetrator accountable but also created lasting reform in legal transparency that continues to protect Kentucky citizens today.

In 1998, he volunteered pro bono to represent a mother dying of AIDS who faced discrimination when her HIV status was unlawfully disclosed by hospital staff. Taking the case on the eve of trial when other attorneys had abandoned her, McMurry secured a verdict that transformed the lives of both the mother and her five children, demonstrating to them that the legal system could work for everyone, regardless of circumstances.

His advocacy work has led to groundbreaking achievements in holding institutions accountable. In 2003, he served as lead counsel in securing a $25.7 million settlement from the Archdiocese of Louisville on behalf of 243 survivors of clergy abuse, marking the largest settlement at that time paid exclusively from diocesan assets.

Another significant victory came in 2006 when McMurry negotiated settlements for 43 survivors of abuse at a Kentucky orphanage operated by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, a case chronicled in the book "The Unbreakable Child" by Kim Michelle Richardson.

In 2009 case of O'Bryan v. Holy See, McMurry made legal history by successfully arguing that the Vatican could be held accountable in U.S. courts for the actions of American bishops in cases of child abuse, effectively challenging the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act.

On October 16, 2014, McMurry was inducted into the Kentucky Civil Rights Hall of Fame for Exemplary Leadership in Civil Rights by the Kentucky Commission on Human Rights. This honor was bestowed on McMurry for McMurry's $2.5 million verdict against the leaders of the Imperial Klans of America. While attending a county fair, Klan members severely beat a 16-year-old Central American young man because of the color of his skin. McMurry served as trial counsel with Morris Dees, the founder of the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC).

Today, McMurry focuses his practice on medical and legal malpractice cases, bringing decades of experience and expertise to these complex areas of law. He holds the distinction of being board-certified as both a Medical Malpractice and Legal Malpractice Trial Specialist by the American Board of Professional Liability Attorneys (ABPLA), representing the highest level of professional excellence in these fields.

McMurry's career exemplifies an attorney's profound impact in fighting for justice, particularly for those who might otherwise have no voice in the legal system. From representing victims of professional misconduct to challenging powerful institutions, William F. McMurry has consistently demonstrated an unwavering commitment to protecting the rights of the injured and vulnerable while helping to shape the landscape of professional liability law in America.
